The concert, or the tour, or the notion, is called the Big Four, and it needs an asterisk. Long ago one of the four became much bigger than the rest.

In alphabetical order, Anthrax, Megadeth, Metallica and Slayer — who all played at Ullevi, Sweden in a thorough and memorable seven-hour concert — were the most popular bands of mid-1980s thrash-metal. Thrash was a powerful mutt: it ran at hardcore-punk speeds and wedged hyper-articulate firebomb guitar solos into small spaces.

Now that all those bands are touring together, under that old banner, the order of billing becomes an important question. Imagine all the lawyers, all the cold logic. (Metal, in the ’80s, was a boys’ game built on aggression, not love, and there are well-documented feuds among some of these bands, particularly between Metallica and Megadeth, since Megadeth is led by Dave Mustaine, who was kicked out of Metallica.)
