

Kokomo Arnold – King Of The Bottleneck Guitar (1934-1937) [1991]

Written by bluesever

Monday, 13 June 2011 08:44 - Last Updated Saturday, 27 March 2021 15:23

Kokomo Arnold – King Of The Bottleneck Guitar (1934-1937) [1991]

01. Milk Cow Blues play 02. Old Original Kokomo Blues play 03. Back to the Woods
04. Sagefield Woman Blues 05. Old Black Cat Blues (Jinx Blues) 06. Sissy Man Blues 07.
Front Door Blues (32 20 Blues) 08. Back Door Blues 09. The Twelves (Dirty Dozens) 10.
Biscuit Roller Blues 11. Chain Gang Blues 12. How Long How Long Blues 13. Bo-Weevil
Blues 14. Busy Bootin' 15. Policy Wheel Blues 16. Milk Cow Blues no. 4 17. Model 'T'
Woman Blues 18. I'll Be Up Some Day 19. Mister Charlie 20. Back Fence Picket Blues 21.
Wild Water Blues 22. Red Beans and Rice 23. Buddie Brown Blues (Rolling Time)
Kokomo Arnold – vocals, guitar

James "Kokomo" Arnold (James 'Kokomo' Arnold), February 15, 1901, in Lovejoy-Station (Lovejoy Station), Georgia, mind. November 8, 1968, in Chicago (Chicago), Illinois. Kokomo Arnold, sinistral bluesy slide-guitar player, learned the basics of his style from his cousin James Uiggza (James Wigges). Having worked in steel mills in Illinois and Pennsylvania, he devoted himself to fishing and brew and music lessons were viewed as a passion, a side to "real life".

Arnold has developed an unconventional style of guitar-based style, once popular in some states, the extreme southern United States. He held the instrument flat on his knees, pulling slide twang. In contrast to the quiet and often reckless approach of many of his contemporaries, Arnold's style is characterized by the pressure and aggression, perfect games in his unusual style combined with an unusually high-pitched, often inarticulate singing, in which are embedded, however, the unexpected manifestation of pure vocal, stressing the important moments in the texts of his compositions.

Conquered by Arnold's reputation has followed him closely in his wanderings through the northern states of the United States in the years after the First World War. Arnold did not record again until 1930, when he recorded the song «Paddlin 'Blues» (frenzied reading of blues songs «Paddling Madeline Home») and blues «Rainy Night» under the pseudonym Gitfiddl Jim (Gitfiddle Jim) at the record company Victor »(Victor) in Memphis. For a decade he continued to record, solely on the record company "Decca". His greatest hits were recorded with a single two-part blues «Old Original Kokomo» (so called by the name of coffee) and «Milk Cow Blues», which he recorded a total of five numbered versions. It was very popular among bluesmen, but in the 50 years experienced a second boom, when it recorded such stars rock 'n' roll as Elvis Presley (Elvis Presley) and Eddie Cochran (Eddie Cochran).

Kokomo Arnold – King Of The Bottleneck Guitar (1934-1937) [1991]

Written by bluesever

Monday, 13 June 2011 08:44 - Last Updated Saturday, 27 March 2021 15:23

For a significant number of exceptions, of Kokomo Arnold's still followed the designed models, but were always colored with his powerful game slide and original texts. His talent as a guitarist adorns record Roosevelt Sykes (Roosevelt Sykes) Mary Johnson (Mary Johnson) and Petey Uetstrou (Peetie Wheatstraw). In 1938, after a quarrel with the Mayo Williams from "Decca Records, he stopped to record. Having a reliable and stable sources of livelihood, it is further down with the proposals to write or talk to reporters. In the early 60's, during the revival of interest in the variety of blues, in which he specialized, Kokomo Arnold made several times in Chicago.

Despite the brevity of the stay Kokomo Arnold's blues on the proscenium, he has an obvious impact on creativity Robert Johnson (Robert Johnson) Which, in turn, was one of the most important bluesmen "second generation", whose legacy later was one of the formative factors of rock music. Kokomo Arnold died in November 1968 in Chicago.

download (mp3 @256 kbs):

yandex ulozto solidfiles global-files

back