As Bugs Bunny quipped during one of his sea-going adventures with Yosemite Sam, "if it's the Captain's mess, let him clean it up." It was Georg Philipp Telemann's own mess that he was seeking to clean up when he took on the chore of composing Kapitänsmusik, or "Captain's Music," as Telemann's wife was an avid gambler with expensive tastes; at one point, his financial picture was so bleak the citizens of Hamburg took up a collection to help the couple out. Telemann was productive enough in terms of Captain's music -- short entertainments, usually on an allegorical theme, consisting of an oratorio and serenata pair and performed at an annual fête held in honor of Hamburg's military captains -- that it commands a separate number in the TWV index of his works. However, very few of these creations -- designed for one performance only, registered and then forgotten -- survive, and CPO's Georg Philipp Telemann: Kapitänsmusik 1724 appears to represent a relatively rare instance in which something from the genre, apparently unique to Telemann, has been recorded.

Whereas there is an unexpected windfall of compositional and expressive variety to be gained from revisiting even the most minor sacred cantatas of Telemann, the Kapitänsmusik genre finds him at his most uncharacteristically vapid and uninspired; the expected is the rule of law here. Superficially pretty arias -- though soprano Magdalena Podkoscielna sings the heck out of them -- dull, merely competent chorale-like choruses; and flat recitative rather characterize the whole of this disc. That's in spite of the fact that Telemann's 1724 Kapitänsmusik is given here in a stellar performance by Ludger Rémy and the Telemannisches Collegium Michaelstein; not even they are able to save it from its pretentious airs and faceless mediocrity. Certainly not everything by a composer whose worklist exceeds 3,000 items is likely to be worthy of recording, and as there are so many sacred cantatas left, one wonders why take on the Kapitänsmusik at this juncture? One figures, to paraphrase explorer Sir Edmund Hillary, "Because it's there." What a pity CPO doesn't utilize the advice of Bugs Bunny instead in regard to recording these things, as this is simply a waste of good resources in the midst of so much Telemann that begs attention. ---Uncle Dave Lewis, AllMusic Review
