Some might say that the Pet Shop Boys have released more live documents than any synth pop band has a right to, but fans would wholeheartedly disagree. Joey Sixpack might not notice, but the duo takes great pride in making each tour's set list unique, plus there are always some surprises for card-carrying fanclub members. Here, on this document of a 2009 concert at London's O2 Arena, that means rarely heard live numbers like "Two Divided by Zero" and "Why Don't We Live Together?" plus the long-lost B-Side "Do I Have To?" Well-worn numbers like "Suburbia" and "Being Boring" are delivered as if they were fresh and new, while the triumphant performance of "West End Girls" shows that PSB have, shockingly, not grown tired of the tune. Kick it all off with a fantastic new mash-up of "More Than a Dream/Heart" and it's a must own for the faithful, but when you add a well-shot DVD that captures the whole stage show, it's the ultimate in PSB live sets. Borrowing an idea from Pink Floyd, the stage set features a wall of white blocks that are deconstructed, rearranged, and scattered as video is projected onto them. The effect is something dynamic and full of change that disappears when the lights come up, leaving nothing but the stark white stage and the fairly motionless duo. Clever, as always. ---David Jeffries, AllMusic Review
