On January 9, 1970, less than three months after the release of Led Zeppelin II, the band played the historic Royal Albert Hall on the third night of an eight-show UK tour. By all accounts it was a high-energy show. When the concert was over, Nick Logan of the New Music Express wrote:

I spoke to Jimmy Page after the show and he confessed that the whole band had suffered extreme nerves beforehand, mainly because people like John Lennon, Eric Clapton and Jeff Beck had requested tickets. "But it was just like it was at the Albert Hall in the summer," said Jimmy, "with everyone dancing around the stage. It was a great feeling. What could be better than having everyone clapping and shouting along? It's indescribable; but it just makes you feel that everything is worthwhile.

You can read Logan's review of the show, along with other press reports, at LedZeppelin.com. The concert was filmed by Peter Whitehead and Stanley Dorfman. But the band was unhappy with the quality of the footage, and it was put away until the release of the two-disc Led Zeppelin DVD in 2003. The film (above) captures the powerful early phase of the band's career.—
